Short Babble

To crop or not to crop is the question. As part of my normal post-processing workflow I may straighten or crop a photo. Except for the recent modelling work, where I have been changing the aspect ratio from 3x2 to square, I usually keep the aspect ratio to the original 3 x 2 ratio. The above photos break with that behaviour. I like the results of changing the aspect ratio to 16 x 9. I also like the way these photos have structural connections to some of my other work within the Roadside Attraction umbrella.

Cheers, Sean

Artist and Mural List

Listing is alphabetical by artist and formatted as follows: Last Name, First Name / Collective; Artist's base; Location of mural; Year mural was painted; Artist's website; number of photograph in grid above or comment. We didn't quite get to all the locations. In other cases I have a photo that I didn't like.

I am a heretic when it comes to cropping. Often I'll leave the aspect ratio unchanged from the camera, which leads to some people saying there's too much going on in my photos. People often get an 8×10 crop as do some subjects. I'm a fan of 16×9. For my murals, I often did a free form crop to fit the mural, and tried to correct the perspective, which sometimes leads to less than optimal results.

As we comment at the time on the middle one, the light was strong on the left, and shadowed on the right. On mine (not yet published as I write) this is obvious. It is much less obvious on yours, leading to a stronger image.

I particularly need to go back to the green hair orange hands images, and review my editing. I suspect my edits have made the colour more garish, and yours is more how I remember it.

The important thing is that it was a fun night coping with the various challenges.

Thank you for visiting and your comments. Not only was it a good evening, it also got me wandering down some new avenues.
